Computers felt like magic to me as a kid, and I've been taking them apart to see how they work ever since. Coding agents brought some of that feeling back. I build with Codex and have built my own agent harness, so I've also spent plenty of time watching a capable model get stuck on an integration a human would have figured out.

That's what caught my eye about DevTool Arena. I like that you measure what happens after a tool gets picked. A recommendation can look great while the agent burns time and tool calls trying to figure out how to use it. I'd like to take one of those failures, change the docs or the tool interface, and rerun the same job to see if the fix actually helped.

At Technomancy IT, clients usually bring me a problem, not a spec. I've built authenticated MCP connectors and shipped the product, database, and deployment workflows they depend on. I've also owned the less glamorous parts: diagnosing production failures at Front Range Internet and supporting the pricing software I built for NuPrice after people started relying on it. I'm interested in bringing that mix to a small team where I can talk to a customer, fix the thing they're stuck on, and see whether it worked.
